MAKING A CLAIM UNDER HOME INSURANCE POLICE

An insurance policy is a legally binding contract between insured and an insurance company. It states when, how and what insurer must pay for and in what circumstances.

Insured should check what policy are covered for when he (she) buy home insurance. This is particularly important when person live in an area where there could be problems with floods, bushfires or frequent crime. Insured should also ensure that the insured amount is sufficient to cover the costs of rebuilding home or replacing lost contents, bearing in mind that it can cost more than insured think to rebuild home.

Insured should check with insurer to avoid being underinsured. Many websites have calculators that let insured estimate the rebuilding costs; the most accurate calculators ask about 20 detailed questions about home. Insured can also take out total replacement policies where the insurer agrees to rebuild his (she) home to a similar standard and quality, rather than paying an agreed amount.

Unfortunately, if insured are at the point of making a claim, he (she) can no longer change the insured amount or the insured events in relation to that claim. Insured can only improve cover for the future.

Be aware also that home insurance may provide insured with additional benefits such as emergency alternative accommodation, removal of debris and demolishing, pay for architect, engineer and surveyor's fees. These additional benefits can be in addition to the sum insured. If insured have additional benefits cover, he (she) shouldn't forget to claim for them as well.

When insured take out an insurance policy or when he (she) renew it, he must disclose relevant information:

- a) when the insurer asks specific questions, or
- b) when there is information insured know, or should reasonably know, which would be relevant to the insurer's decision to accept the policy. This may include all prior insurance claims, existing damage or past renovations to home [2].

Insured are not required to disclose something he (she) don't know.

The insurer is required to give policy information to insured. This will usually contain a summary of what insured have disclosed for insured to check and correct if necessary. If insured arrange a policy over the phone, the call is often recorded. Therefore, the insurer will often have good evidence about what was said at the time.

If insured deal with the insurer over the phone, he (she) shouldn't answer questions that hr (she) do not understand. Insured may ask the insurer to explain further or get the assistance of an interpreter.

Before making an insurance claim, insured need to think about whether he (she) should a claim at all because it may affect ability to get insurance later, as well as the cost of future premiums. Insured may also have to pay an excess, being an amount of money insured agree to pay in the event of a claim. Insured may consider not claiming when there is very minor damage and the cost of repair is almost the same as or less than the cost of the excess [2].

Policy may require insured to notify insurer of the incident or the damage as soon as possible. A failure to notify insurer within a reasonable time may be a basis for refusal of a claim, so it is better not to delay.

If insured are making a claim over the phone, it is recommended to work out what he (she) are going to say before ring. It is important to keep descriptions simple and accurate. Insured should not ring the insurer if he (she) are upset or still in shock.

If possible, insured may get a claim form so he (she) have time to think about what happened so he (she) can describe it clearly.

If the insurer tells insured over the phone that he (she) cannot claim or a claim will be rejected, this may not be right. Insured should ask the insurer to put their reasons for rejection in writing so he (she) can get legal advice.

Insured may keep a note of phone claim (including who insured spoke to and when, the actual conversation and any claim number) or a copy of his (she) claim form.

If insured are affected by a disaster such as flood or bushfire, he (she) should make a claim as soon as possible. It does not matter that insured policy documents have been lost, as insurer can easily verify any cover insured have with them.

Insured should find out whether he (she) are entitled to emergency accommodation under policy and for how long. Insurer is also obliged to fast-track claim if insured are in financial need and to make urgent financial need and to make an advance payment if appropriate. However, any advance payment will be deducted from the total value of a claim.

Insurers should conduct claims handling in a fair, transparent and timely manner and under certain timeframes regarding:

- when the insurer has to decide to accept or deny the claim;
- what the insurer has to do when further information, assessment or investigation is required;
- how often the insurer has to keep insured informed with the progress of the claim.

If the insurer is not making a decision and not informing insured whether further information is required or why there is a delay, insured may make a written complaint to the insurer's internal dispute resolution department.

If insured cannot pay the excess because he (she) are in financial difficulty, insured should ask the insurer to take the excess out of any claim he are to be paid. Alternatively, if insured are not going to be paid a cash settlement because the insurer is organising repairs to be done, insured ask to make payments by instalments. It is unreasonable for an insurer to not agree to do this. The insurer should not reject a claim just because insured cannot pay the excess up front. If the insurer won't be reasonable, insured should get legal advice [1].

The insurer will usually send out an assessor or an adjuster to examine the claim. They may interview insured, neighbours, witnesses and review police reports. If insured feel the assessor is treating insured unfairly, he (she) should seek advice or help – for example, he (she) may want to ask for an interpreter or a friend to sit in on any interviews or set out complaint in writing to the insurer if that would be easier. Insured should not be intimidated into dropping a claim.

How much evidence will be required will depend on the nature and the value of the claim. For building claims, expert reports may be required to determine the cause and the extent of the damage, and/or the appropriate method of rectification. This will usually become relevant in the event of a dispute over the claim. For a contents claim, insured need to get evidence to show what has been lost or damaged. It will be useful if insure can provide receipts, credit card or bank statements showing the purchase, warranties, photos or video recordings in which the items appear, or declarations from people who had seen the items.

If possible, insured should talk to insurer before touching or moving anything in home alter the event such as a fire, storm or theft. In the event of criminal activity such as a break– and-enter, insured should also contact the police. If home is exposed to further damage from the weather, or because the premises can no longer be secured (for example, insurance law service locks, windows or doors have been broken), insured should do only what is necessary to prevent further damage or loss. Insurer will want an assessor to examine the damage before making a decision in relation to claim, and will also want to approve the repairer [2].

Usually insurance contract clause provides that where the repairer is selected and authorised by the insurer, the insurer is responsible for the quality of the workmanship and materials. The insurer must also handle any complaint about the timeliness of the work or conduct of the repairer as part of their complaints handling process. So, if the repairs are faulty or incomplete and the insurer chose the repairer, the insurer is responsible for fixing this.

There are four main reasons for rejection of a claim: non-disclosure; exclusion clauses; fraud; policy cancellation.

When insured make, a claim, the insurer may refuse a claim and cancel his policy if it discovers that insured did not disclose certain information correctly or at all when he took out the policy. Common examples are that insured did not tell the insurer about prior insurance claims, existing damage or past renovations to home.

Insured may be able to dispute the insurer's decision to reject a claim if for example:

- insured did tell them this information;
- the insurer did not clearly inform insured of duty to disclose when he (she) topic out the policy, or otherwise insured to believe the information was not relevant or/necessary; or
- the insurer would not have refused to provide insured with insurance if he(she) had told them the missing information (insured may need to pay a higher premium in this case).

If the claim is rejected for nondisclosure, insured should request a copy of the application form or any telephone recording when insured took out the policy.

If the claim is rejected on the basis of nondisclosure, insured should get legal advice or even lodge a complaint to the court.

Insurance policies often contain conditions that insured have to comply with, such as keeping home well maintained or having keyed locks on all windows and deadlocks on all external doors.

The insurer may refuse the claim if insured have failed to comply with a condition. However; if the failure did not contribute to the loss or damage suffered, the insurer cannot refuse a claim. For example, insured may have failed to have keyed locks on all windows as required by insurance policy but a thief enters home by smashing a window or knocking down the front door.

Insurance policies will also contain exclusion clauses saying when the insurer will not cover insured against certain types of loss or damage. Common examples are preexisting defects, «fair wear and tear» flood, damage arising from faulty construction or design subsidence, erosion, and seepage.

If the insurer denies the claim saying that the damage was caused by a pre-existing defect in the property, insured may argue that they cannot reject the claim because insured were unaware of the defect when he (she) took out the insurance policy (and a reasonable person in the circumstances would not have been aware of it). This is, for example, when the roof let water in because it was poorly constructed.

Insurance policies often exclude «fair wear & tear» and damage caused by the failure to maintain the home. For example, if a storm blew tiles off roof the insurer may reject a claim and say that home was old and the tiles needed replacement anyway because of their age. Then, insured will need to provide:

- 1) evidence to show that the damage was caused by a storm or other event covered by the policy;
- 2) evidence of regular maintenance work or inspections evidence of the state of repair of the home generally [2].

Some insurance policies do not cover damage caused by flood, or severely restrict the circumstances in which they will pay. Flood is usually defined as water overflowing from natural or man-made water-courses such as rivers, canals or storm water drains. It is distinguished from damage caused by rainwater or storm water, that is, rain that accumulates on the ground because of the severity of the storm.

If a claim is rejected on the basis of flood, insured need to get advice because:

- sometimes the insurer agrees to pay claims anyway when many people are affected;
- if there is damage caused by both rainwater and floodwater, insured may be able to get a claim paid where, for example, the rainwater entered home and caused the damage first, or the particular damage claimed was caused by rainwater coming through a hole in the roof as opposed to caused by the flood water;

 however, if the water that entered the home and caused the damage was combination of both floodwater and rainwater, and neither of the above applies, insured may not be covered at all.

To establish fraud, the insurer needs to prove that insured intended to deceive the insurer. If fraud is established, the insurer can reject a claim and void policy. This means insured no longer have insurance cover. In serious cases the matter may be referred to the police. However, the insurer cannot rely on fraud if the fraud was minor and it would be unfair for the insurer to reject the claim.

Insurers are always on the lookout for fraud. When investigated, be cooperative and provide all relevant information. If insured think the information requested is excessive or irrelevant and/or the investigation is taking too long, he (she) should complain to the insurer. Insured should try to be assertive but not rude or aggressive.

If insured are being investigated for fraud, he should get legal advice immediately. Also, insured make sure that an interpreter is arranged for the investigation if insured cannot speak language well.

If insured feel he (she) have been dealt with unfairly, court can review the decision of the insurance company to determine whether there is an arguable case of fraud.

Insurers sometimes cancel insurance policies in the middle of the cover period. This may be done in response to additional information provided by insured that increases the insurer's risk to an unacceptable level. Another more common reason is that insured have failed to pay the premium for the policy. This often happens when insured have opted to pay premium in instalments via direct debit and direct debit has failed.

If insurer tells insured that policy has been cancelled, he (she) should get advice about whether they had sufficient reasons to cancel the policy and whether they took appropriate steps to inform insured of the cancellation. Insured should also consider taking out another insurance policy in the meantime just in case he (she) need to make a claim.

What can insured do if a claim is rejected:

request an internal review with insurer's internal dispute resolution department as soon as possible;

- alternatively, insured may go to court;
- alternatively, insured may choose to do nothing or give up – get legal advice before he (she) do this.
